Let's take a closer look at
Making Turns.

Making Turns

Using Your Indicators

Every turn that you make in your car requires you to use an indicator, or blinker, so that other road users are aware of your intentions. In any unfamiliar car, ensure you are aware of where the indicator control is positioned before driving.

Making Turns

Using Your Indicators

The indicator, or blinker control, normally appears behind the steering wheel, connected to the steering column. It may be on the right or the left hand side.

Using Your Indicators

Using your blinkers will cause your indicator lights to flash at the front and back of the car, either on the left or right side, to indicate to other drivers what your intentions are.

Making Turns

On the road pictured, making a left-hand turn does not require you to give way to anyone, except perhaps pedestrians.

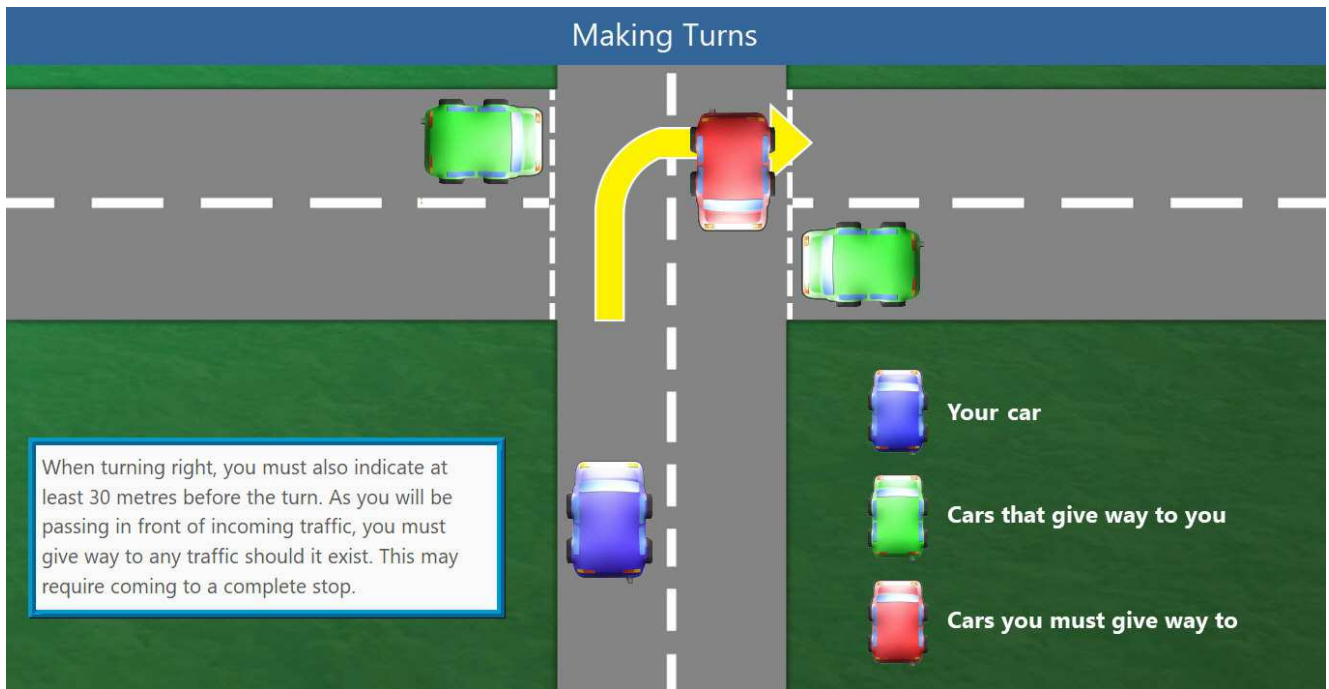

For any turn, you must turn on the appropriate indicator (left or right) at least 30 metres before the turn.

When you have to stop before turning, ensure that your wheels face forwards.

It's tempting to wait with your wheels turned in the direction you want to turn. However, if your wheels are turned to the right, and someone runs into the back of you, you will be pushed directly and dangerously into oncoming traffic. With wheels facing straight ahead, this is not the case.
